

Do You Know Your Financial Family Tree?

Can financial habits, like physical traits, be passed from generation to generation?

Grandma
Betty Goldrush

Grandpa
Bill Pennywise

Grandma
Joan Deepockets

Grandpa
John Woodstock

Silent Generation: Stealthy, Wealthy and Wise

Grandparents Pennywise and Woodstock belong to the wealthiest, thriftiest generation in history.¹ Saving money for large purchases and avoiding credit card debt are second nature to them — a financial best practice at any age.

Mom
Linda Pennywise

Dad
Dennis Woodstock

Uncle
Brian Pennywise

Generation X: Owe Is Me

Uncle Brian hosts the best parties, but shoulders more debt too.³ With retirement on the horizon, his priority is to stabilize cash flow through better budgeting and planning and make sure his family is protected with safeguards like whole life insurance and annuities.

Baby Boomers: Living Large and Long

Linda and Dennis are redefining aging, staying independent through smart retirement planning and good health care.² They've included annuities in their financial mix, to help create income in retirement, and increased their budget for medical expenses as they get older.

Brother
Alan Pennywise-Woodstock

Gen Z Centennials: Debt-Free Digital Native

Alan manages his money by app in anticipation of college costs, but worries about finding trustworthy financial advice online. Incidentally, he heard about Grandpa Pennywise’s “pay yourself first” lifelong savings strategy of 20 percent — bringing the family’s financial strategies full circle.

Sister
Jessica Pennywise-Woodstock

Millennials: Work to Live Every Moment

Jessica works 60-hour weeks as a freelance travel writer. Like many millennials, Jessica considers herself a business owner. Without the benefits of a big corporation, she’s looking into disability income insurance to help protect her paycheck, in case she is unable to work.

No matter your life stage, greater financial and emotional confidence is within reach. Talking with an experienced financial professional can help your family tree prosper for generations to come.
